Atomically thin magnetic device could lead to new memory technologies

Submitted by Arts & Sciences Web Team on May 3, 2018 - 12:00am

Magnetic materials are the backbone of modern digital information technologies, such as hard-disk storage. A University of Washington-led team has now taken this one step further by encoding information using magnets that are just a few layers of...

Read more

Department of Physics
University of Washington
Physics-Astronomy Building, Rm. C121
Box 351560
Seattle, WA 98195-1560

Phone: (206) 543-2770
Fax: (206) 685-0635
physrecp@uw.edu